back up kirsten ortwed

solo exhibition 15 may – 4 july 2025

They are: not looking at each other not talking not alone not interested not familiar faces not all ears not all ears not shy not in need of scarves

Lie like you mean it, like hundreds of kilos of bronze on the floor. This is not a tub. This was a tub. The sculpture as well as the tub are lying. First it was a hollow for liquids and humans, eventually it became a hard pile unfit for bodies. Form transformed, function down the drain. Out of the blue and fire, this black backside appears and instantly it is frontal. Deep sea forehead or mummified belly. Blowhole, navel, button.

It is: not a useful container not warm, nor wet (anymore) not oil-black, but close enough not a whale

Back is back, backing up is backing up, and isn't any casting process an act of saving. Not from danger but for longer or shorter futures. Sculptures tend to pile up and turn into a body of work. A body of work is easily mistaken for an archive, so what can we do when it turns its back on us.

We can: save some questions look closer consider whether the opposite of a bright pool is a brown hill consider whether the opposite of casting metal is trimming hair consider whether the opposite of the gaze is the sculpture or the closed eyes

The opposite of backing up is throwing out. Kirsten Ortwed found two discarded heads in Italy and stored them for later use.
