Arches and Ink

Sheree Hovsepian, Nate Lewis, and Sahana Ramakrishnan

February 6 - April 3, 2021

Arches and Ink includes artworks by Sheree Hovsepian, Nate Lewis, and Sahana Ramakrishnan, bringing together mutual concerns among their practices; the disruption of traditional displays of the human body and shared material sensibilities.

There is a certain poetry to each artists' work in the show. Hovsepian, Lewis, and Ramakrishnan take different approaches to the body but all possess an empathy, spirituality, and an interest in relationships and performance. Using a variety of techniques with paper, photography, and assemblage, there is a strong focus on texture, form, and shadow, rather than a reliance on color. These tendencies lend themselves to a slowness, an earthiness, and again, a poetry in the work.

The title of the show "Arches and Ink" refers to these common threads. "Arches" as a word relates to the body, perhaps even the sensual shapes of the body, including the arching of a back. It also suggests inanimate physical structures such as the curved shape of a bridge or the thickness of strong paper. "Ink" has long been used to adorn and alter the surface of the human body through the inking of tattoos, while it is also the traditional medium of choice for use on paper, in photography, and beyond.

Sheree Hovsepian explores the materiality of photography through modes of assemblage. Her work combines images of the body with angular forms and a variety of tactile materials, such as wood, ceramic and string. Hovsepian highlights the degree to which "structures" — physical, political, and otherwise — shape one's sense of place, and one's sense of self.

Influenced by the "visual language of medical diagnostics," Nate Lewis creates highly textured photo-based collages that are inspired by his background working as an I.C.U. nurse in Washington D.C. This series of work by Lewis, titled "Signaling," showcases abstract images of black figures in motion. Here, Lewis concentrates on the theme of movement, as it relates to both histories of dance and migrations of the African diaspora.

Sahana Ramakrishnan uses symbols and diverse visual references in her work as a way of addressing "the violent and shifting processes by which we form our cultural, gender, sexual, and human identities." The mixed-media works on paper presented in this exhibition center around the artist's more personal relationship to histories of spiritualism, mythicism, animals, and art.
