ANDREA BÜTTNER: THE HEART OF RELATIONS

Preview: Saturday, 21 September, 5:00 - 8:00 pm

Exhibition: 25 September - 14 December 2019

Frieze East End Gallery Afternoon, gallery talk by Alison Wright: Sunday 29 September, 2:00 pm

Andrea Büttner's third solo exhibition with Hollybush Gardens, 'The Heart of Relations' will present a major new site-specific installation. Referencing Giotto's star-filled blue fresco adorning the vault of the Scrovegni Chapel in Padua, Italy, Büttner's installation will transform the gallery's arched ceiling into a painted sky mural populated by life-size potatoes. The exhibition will also include a selection of sculptures and works on paper.

Büttner has recurrently employed the motif of the potato, taking an interest in its inelegant, plump formal quality, and in its appearance in art history as an iconography of poverty. In Van Gogh's The Potato Eaters (1885), one of the most well-known art historical appearances of the potato, the peasants are rendered in 'the colour of a really dusty potato', according to the painter, thus forming a metonymic correlation between the potato and the threadbare manual labourers at the dinner table. Büttner's site-specific ceiling mural relates this iconographic history to a religious context, which bears the antithetical associations of wealth and opulence, on the one hand, and the ideals of poverty and charity, on the other. Situating this work within the art gallery, Büttner brings a range of histories around poverty, wealth and devotion into a constellation.

The grouping of glass-mounted postcards in the exhibition came out of Büttner's research toward a forthcoming video project. The postcards depict the stained glass windows designed by John Piper in Coventry Cathedral and the altar fresco mural by Georg Meistermann in the Marina Regina Martyrum in Berlin, works in which formal abstraction and symbolism converge. The postcards also gesture to the relation of devotional spaces to other social functions, including mourning, atoning, and healing. The Maria Regina Martyrum, a Roman Catholic church, is located near the former Plötzensee Prison, which was an execution site under the Nazi regime. The church was constructed in the 1960s to honour those who died resisting the regime and functions as a religious space as well as a tribute and memorial.

The exhibition also presents new sculptural works modelled after designed spaces. These maquette-like works engage with the history of site-specific art in architectural spaces and the relation between interior design and fresco painting. One sculpture recreates the dining room of Nelson A. Rockefeller's New York City apartment, which featured a commissioned site-specific painted work by the Swiss-American painter Fritz Glarner. Completed in 1963, Glarner's 'Rockefeller Dining Room' was sold as a piece of art in 1987 and is today held in the collection of Museum Haus Konstruktiv. Rather than recreate the appearance of Glarner's painted work, Büttner's model replaces the interior surfaces with monochrome gouache panels, rendering the structural constituents of the space into abstract formal elements.

A group of four works on paper in this show feature frame-like forms that are themselves circumscribed by the wooden frame. The frame-like forms recall Derrida's notion of the 'supplement', defined as an entity that is seemingly a secondary addition from the outside, but which in fact supplies what is missing within the thing which it 'supplements'. These forms bring to mind the glazing bars of stained glass windows—which John Piper referred to as 'splendid discipline'—that serve a structurally necessary function but also as lines delineating form. The works also enter into dialogue with the complex roles attributed to frames in Western art history. For instance, in the medieval period the frame of an altarpiece did not always appear as an enclosure but often imparted the architectural setting of the painted picture and helped to establish the depth of simulated space. Moreover, as art historian Wolfgang Kemp noted in The Rhetoric of the Frame: Essays on the Boundaries of the Artwork, frames in this period were often more costly and elaborate than the art they contained and thus key in conveying the preciousness of the altarpiece. Questioning how content is distinguished from the frame, these works extend Büttner's ongoing examination of structures and codes within social and cultural systems.

Alison Wright is Professor in Italian Art in the Department of History of Art at UCL. Before joining UCL she trained at the Courtauld Institute of Art. The research for her first monograph, The Pollaiuolo Brothers: the Arts of Florence and Rome (Yale University Press 2005), centred on aspects of production, design and patronage in later fifteenth-century art, with a focus on the interrelation of the arts, disegno, portraiture, and the figure of the goldsmith-painter-sculptor. While an I Tatti Fellow she collaborated on the exhibition Renaissance Florence: the Art of the 1470s, (1999-2000). Related projects include the exhibition Nameless: Anonymous Drawings of 15th- and 16th-Century Italy (Moray Art Centre, Scotland) and co-authored With and Without the Medici: Art and Patronage in Tuscany, 1434-94. Her most recent book, Frame Work: Honour and Ornament in Italian Renaissance Art (Yale University Press 2019), examines framing in and around painting, sculpture and related arts in respect to social ritual, artistic change and the production of meaning. Wright has published extensively on relief sculpture and the public situation of statuary (Art History, 2011) and she is now studying the transformations of gold in Early Modern art and society.
